Museums

Museum of Ethnography

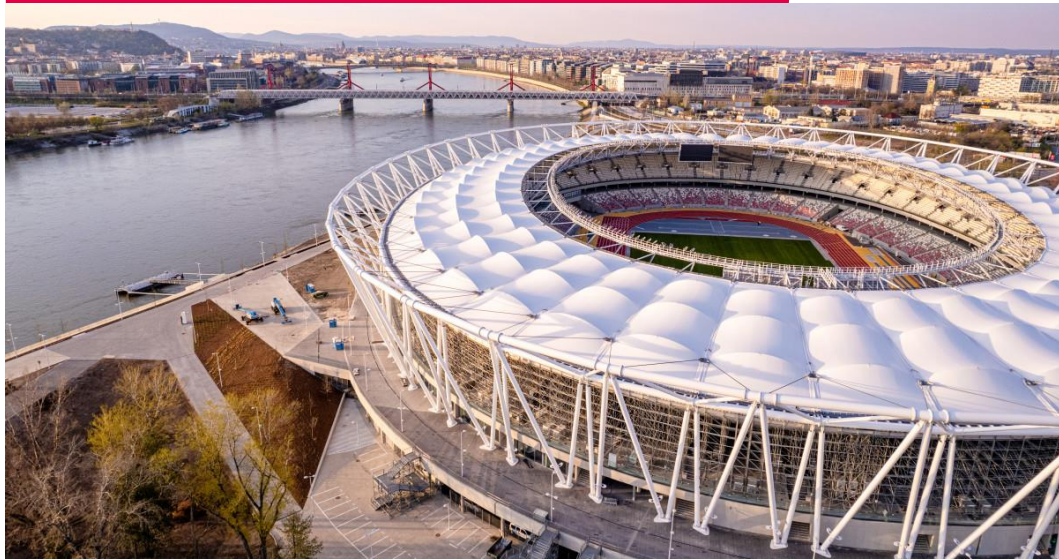

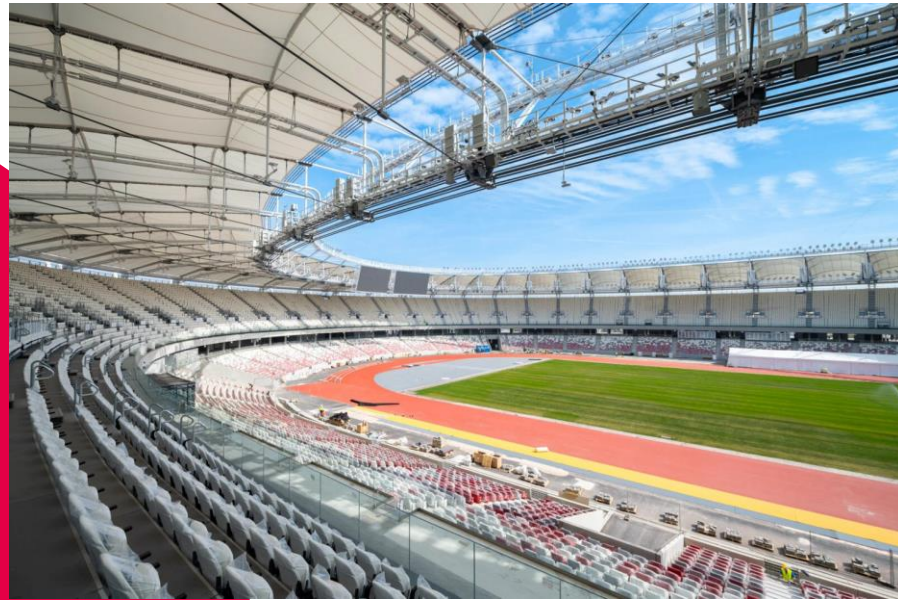

The Museum of Ethnography in Budapest not only depicts traditional Hungarian life but is also housed in an award-winning building that has been recognized as the "World's Best Architecture" at the International Property Awards in London.

The Light Art Museum Budapest is particularly significant due to the historical relevance of Hungarian inventor Sándor Just and Croatian inventor Franjo Hanaman, who developed a tungsten filament lamp that revolutionized lighting with its longer lifespan and brighter illumination. This innovation paved the way for the widespread use of tungsten filament lamps, which were first introduced to the market by the Hungarian company "Tungsram" in 1904. The museum's focus on light as an artistic medium is therefore closely tied to Hungary's contributions to the advancement of lighting technology.
